5 PATHWAYS SPARKING CHANGE
PAGE 18
We all want the best for our children. My 18-year-old son, Caleb (shown here with our sponsored child, Betania, 8, in Paraguay), reminds me of that simple truth every day.

It’s a shared love of children that brings together diverse communities, supporters and partners to help children create change in their communities — and the world. Simply put, we couldn’t do it without you.

Key achievements we’ve made together are the focus of this Annual Report issue of ChildVoice. Your generosity can be seen in the number of schools built, health checkups received as well as child and youth groups formed (p. 14-15).

But, what I find truly inspiring is how your support is helping change harmful traditions and practices that will influence generations. Consider eight-month-old Halima. She’s alive today because of a project in Ghana that’s tackling local childbirth traditions that endanger the lives of mothers and babies (p. 6). Meanwhile, families in 16-year-old Kasthuri’s Dalit (lower caste) community in India are breaking deeply-rooted gender and class barriers (p. 8).

Our commitment to tackling cultural and social barriers to change is the catalyst for centres of excellence we’re championing in countries where we work. Each will be a space to address important issues, share best practices, drive innovation and mobilize people, partnerships and resources (p. 8-9).

You support incredible change

These are all important achievements, but this report also reminds us we have much to do. In the year ahead, we’ll focus on creating a groundswell of change in countries and communities around the world. In the next issue of ChildVoice, we’ll share the beginning of an exciting new chapter to help us get there.

Thank you,

A supporter’s story

Sir Sean Madsen

Describe yourself in three words.
Optimistic, dedicated, obstinate.

What was it like visiting your sponsored child in Paraguay?
I was advised by the staff that Marcos was a quiet boy. However, when I got there he came out, took my arm and put it around his shoulder and held it there with his hand. So that kind of said everything.

What are your hopes for Marcos’ future?
Marcos has ambitions to be a lawyer someday, and I hope he can get there. Also, Marcos is taking English lessons. Next time I visit, I hope we will be able to talk without an interpreter.

What would you say to others thinking about sponsoring a child?
The biggest benefit is realizing what you’re doing is helping a child. You see the child’s face and receive letters and reports on how they’re doing in school. It’s a relationship.

If you want to save mothers' and babies' lives, it begins with shifting mindsets about childbirth — putting knowledge and power in the hands of women

By William Anim-Dankwa, communications manager, Ghana

The giggles of eight-month-old Halima are a sweet sound to Issah (pictured), 23, but they’re also a sad reminder. At 21, she lost her first daughter. Like many Ghanian women, she had delivered at home using a traditional birth attendant without the requisite medical training or sterilized tools to save her child.

Eighteen months later, Issah delivered her second child, Halima, in a local health clinic via caesarean section. Issah’s choice of where to give birth was the result of a Government of Canada-funded project called Promoting Maternal, Newborn, Infant and Child Sustainable Health Efforts (PROMISE). The four-year project (2016-2020), reaching 40,000 women, focuses on health-service delivery and improved nutrition to reduce maternal and child mortality. Our inclusive approach is creating steady change.

► We involve women and men in maternal, newborn and child-health groups to change beliefs that women are weak or having an extra-marital affair if they deliver at the clinic.

► To leverage the influence of respected traditional birth attendants, and provide a new means of livelihood, we offer them skills-training. In their new role, birth attendants refer and travel with women to health clinics and provide post-delivery support.

Progress in Ghana

The Promoting Maternal, Newborn, Infant and Child Sustainable Health Efforts project area includes three districts in Ghana, Malawi and Rwanda

In Ghana, between 2016 to 2018:

• Baby survival increased from 64.9 percent to 83.7 percent

• The percentage of mothers who received post-natal care within two days of childbirth rose from 41.9 to 66.7 percent

• Fathers who feel men should be involved in maternal, newborn and child health rose from 58.9 to 90.4 percent

Did you know?

Each year, more than 100,000 women in West and Central Africa die from pregnancy-related causes — mostly during labour and delivery. That’s more than any other region of the world.*

Women who deliver their babies safely in health centres are powerful influencers of change

By Semereta Sewasaw, communications manager, Ethiopia

Two months ago, Ashura (pictured), 20, became one of the first women in her family to give birth in a health centre, delivering her daughter, Ekram. Her mother, like many Ethiopian women, gave birth at home.

Each year in Ethiopia, thousands of women and children don’t survive childbirth. Ashram is trying to change that. “So far, I’ve encouraged 15 mothers to deliver their babies in the health centre,” she shares.

Through the Government of Canada-funded Canada-Africa Initiative to Address Maternal, Newborn and Child Mortality (2016-2020), we’re reaching 1.7-million women in Africa. Our goal: to improve the delivery of essential health services to moms, pregnant women, newborns and children under the age of five.

With your support, we’ve made remarkable progress. Community sessions and conferences are helping women understand the risks of home delivery and the importance of pre- and post-natal care. Working closely with community members has shaped our successful approach.

▶ To overcome expectant mothers’ fears of dying at a health centre, we’re training health workers to have the confidence and skills for complicated deliveries.

▶ During birth, it’s customary for women to be surrounded by family. To support women, we’re building waiting rooms and encouraging families to continue their traditional ceremonies when they go home.

“ I encourage women in my community not to be afraid of delivering their babies in health centres.” — Ashura, 20, Ethiopia

In the past six years, the percentage of births attended by healthcare professionals in CCFC-supported Ethiopian communities rose by 24 percent (52 percent in 2012 to 76 percent in 2017)

Progress in Ethiopia

The Canada-Africa Initiative to Address Maternal, Newborn and Child Mortality project area includes 20 districts in Ethiopia, Kenya, Malawi and Tanzania

• The number of women giving birth at the Woledi health centre in Ethiopia increased from an average of 10 per month in 2016 to 60 per month this year

• Five health centres in Ethiopia have been equipped with solar power to operate laboratory equipment and other essentials

ChildVoice 2018 ANNUAL REPORT | 7
Our new centre of excellence in India will champion the social inclusion of girls, women and others often excluded, including Dalits (lower caste or class)

By Lipi Jobson, communications manager, India

Social exclusion is deeply rooted in cultures, economies, as well as social and political institutions around the world. In India, Dalits are forced to live on the fringes of society. They’re denied their most basic rights, highly vulnerable to abuse and shunned from many public places. Dalit girls face double-discrimination based on their gender and caste.

Our new centre of excellence will help us build knowledge and networks to change practices and policies that impede progress. Already, your support is making a difference. Sixteen-year-old Kasthuri is one example.

Your support of education, awareness and advocacy efforts in Kasthuri’s remote Dalit community has helped inspire her to develop a school cultural program and to lead a protest (roadblock) against a government-built quarry to draw attention to environmental concerns. Today, Kasthuri’s community is breaking gender and caste barriers, making history with their “firsts.”

• We’re celebrating the first successful negotiation between Kasthuri’s remote hamlet and the government. Forty women met and advocated for the installation of four wells to bring clean water to the community.

• Previously landless, groups of women organized, saved money and received a loan from a financial institution to buy land. Now, 32 families are involved in agricultural production.

“[Higher caste] people ask us to participate in local events. We underestimated ourselves, so they underestimated us.”

Progress in Kasthuri’s hamlet (population: 288)

• More than 30 children, up from two, received a government loan to seek higher education

• Fifteen women own a house and six are self-employed — both community firsts

• More than 100 community members are benefiting from government programs they never accessed before

Did you know?

• Our success stems from helping community members identify shared concerns; form an association to unite their interests and actions; promote women and Dalit leadership; and attend trainings on rights, laws and resources available. Vocational and advocacy training, economic development projects and new linkages to support organizations contribute to progress.
Creating change, through centres of excellence

Paraguay’s new centre of excellence will bring together people, practices and resources to advocate for child participation and protection

By Rosanna Menchaca, communications manager, Paraguay

During the past decade, awareness, advocacy and education efforts in Paraguay have shifted the view of child participation. Now, the belief that children should participate in decision-making is no longer a “concession of adults,” it’s a right. We’ve also been making child protection a priority.

How have we done it? We built a strong network of allies across communities, governments and other non-governmental organizations at the community, municipal and national level. Our new centre of excellence will continue to advance joint strategies to accelerate change.

Last year, nearly 1,200 children and youth had leadership and child-rights training, and nearly 600 children were organized into more than 30 groups, now part of the Association in Defense of the Rights of Childhood and Adolescence (ADDNA), a children’s network.

“I’m a strong, structured organization,” shares ADDNA member, Alcides, 16 (pictured). “I want all children to have this type of space to be heard.”

Here’s what we’re doing:

➢ To give children a safe place to speak about childhood policies and accountability processes, we’ve created and strengthened a national network for children and adolescence that gives them the chance to influence national leaders.

➢ To support national change, we’re working with the government to include children’s rights in the public and political arena. We co-lead a network of 20 local and international non-governmental organizations promoting child and youth rights (read about our success p. 4).

Did you know?

➢ CCFC Paraguay helped lead successful efforts to include the protection of children from violence in the United Nations’ Global Goals. Due in part to these efforts, Paraguay is one of 20 countries named a “Pathfinder” country, fast-tracking efforts to save children from violence.

With notes from Diego Martinez, project manager, Paraguay and Amelia Aguirre, Local partner in Alcides’ community: Fundación Alda

“Child participation is an important right and an important voice. Children have the right to participate in things that affect them. It is the government’s responsibility to ensure that children can participate. We need to continue to work with the government so that children see how to get involved in their communities.”

— Alcides, 16, Paraguay

Progress in Paraguay

➢ Seventy-five schools working with Christian Children’s Fund of Canada (CCFC) — reaching 13,980 students — have formed school councils and created spaces where children learn and exercise their rights

➢ Nearly 600 children are being trained in children’s rights through a special network of children’s organizations in CCFC-supported programs

➢ CCFC-supported community workshops, awareness campaigns and radio programs (plus press coverage) are helping eliminate child domestic labour and trafficking

Investing in women’s economic empowerment is crucial to gender equality and the health and future of children

By Patrice Zongo, communications manager, Burkina Faso

If you want to see the incredible difference you make, it’s in the stories of eight women who travelled 55 kilometres to our office in Burkina Faso to say thank you for a village-savings-and-loans (VSL) project that’s changed their lives. It could also be in the achievement of Alimata, a mother-of-four who is one of two female VSL members elected to serve as municipal councillors, a first in the community.

These women are part of a successful VSL that’s continued to thrive since the community graduated from our support three years ago. Since the VSL project began in 2014, 66 groups, representing 1,149 women, have saved nearly $270,000 and loaned nearly $150,000 within their groups to help one another start and grow small businesses. Thanks to training sessions, the women are running successful businesses.

Two challenges had to be overcome early in the project:

- With no financial institution in the area, there was no saving culture in the community. But, as the first women in the project engaged, others soon joined, excited by the thought of financial independence.
- A distrust in microcredit loans due to unscrupulous past practices led to initial distrust of the VSL. Ongoing education sessions and a study to understand how to address local concerns helped regain trust.

My daughter is always curious about my village-savings-and-loans activities. My participation helped me develop confidence. People noticed, and I was elected a local council member.

— Alimata, VSL member and municipal councillor

Progress in Alimata’s community

- Almost all women in the community joined the village-savings-and-loans project (VSL)
- Eighty-five percent of women have developed a business and all have seen their income increase by 30 to 300 percent
- Women are paying for their children’s health and education needs, such as buying bicycles for their children’s travels to and from school

Did you know?

- We design programs that can multiply and grow. Since 2014, VSL participation (men and women) ballooned from one Christian Children’s Fund of Canada-supported community to 127 communities — involving 434 groups and 9,354 members. A total of $905,790 has been saved and more than $650,000 has been used for loans.
Providing teens with safe spaces to build knowledge, confidence and leadership skills kindles youth-led community change

By Enmanuel Castro, communications manager, Nicaragua

Youth are playing an increasingly important role in the development of communities in Nicaragua. At the forefront is a youth group of 30 teens named JUPAC and a 70-member strong children’s council of six-to 17-year-olds.

These young trailblazers are providing input in community council meetings and other public forums, building support networks across schools, communities and government to drive change.

JUPAC gathered 751 signatures, and successfully petitioned district authorities to cover 11 damaged manholes along a busy school walking route. And, the children’s council has been busy leading an awareness campaign that’s helping boys recognize their responsibility in teen pregnancies and encouraging parents to educate their children about sexual health.

Creating and strengthening youth groups is especially important in communities where children are marginalized. Your support has helped us increase the number of youth groups in our programs from four to 10 this past year. We’ve shared key learnings with all of our local partners.

➤ Training has helped youth develop self-esteem, confidence and skills to overcome their fears of being judged for expressing ideas in public spaces.

➤ Positioning JUPAC’s activities as contributing to social development has helped youth gain a strong ally in local political leaders.

Before, my community had high levels of [youth] violence. Now, we participate for the benefit of our community.
— Hector, 17, Nicaragua (JUPAC member)
How we spark and sustain change

My visit to a Dalit (lower caste or class) community in India reminded me of a powerful truth: children are our best hope of genuine, lasting change.

I listened to young people speak passionately about their fight for equality in a society that denies them justice, access to health, education and other services. Yet, their dreams are still big and bright.

Some people say working with children is idealistic but impractical. However, what we’ve learned is it’s the only way to sustain progress. Creating better programs, policies and practices means engaging and listening to everyone, including children and others who are often left out. Children who are heard can make their needs prioritized and contribute to finding new solutions to serious social issues.

It’s also become clear we need to be more deliberate in our efforts to change cultural attitudes and practices that silence, exclude and harm children. Otherwise, we risk young people leaving the same legacy of discrimination, violence and poverty to their children.

Today’s youth will create a better future for their children

As we move forward, we’re focusing our efforts on tackling five key barriers to change — placing children’s voices at the centre of all we do (p. 18–19).

Thank you for your tremendous support. Together, we’ll learn from the will and wisdom of children and create a new era of progress.

Warm wishes,

Dr. John Dirks

Sophia's story

After community graduation

Earlier this year, Sophia’s community in Paraguay graduated following 12 years of Christian Children’s Fund of Canada (CCFC) support. The 19-year-old nursing student was eager to share how your generosity has changed her life — and the life of her family and community.

What word best describes you?
Helpful.

What is your first memory of CCFC?
It was watching the community centre being built. While we [children] didn’t understand what was happening, we were excited.

What was it like before CCFC came?
Children did not have spaces to play or have fun. We didn’t know our rights, and more children worked and didn’t go to school. Everyone lived side by side but alone.

What’s changed since then?
The attitude of the community. We think more about each other and the development of the community. We’re free to defend our rights.

How has life changed for your family?
My brother and I had school support. I have a sister who studied baking and makes bread to sell. My parents did training in advocacy. We’ve developed as people.

What’s been the greatest community challenge?
Changing the beliefs of people with respect to children — usually in the countryside where children’s rights are more violated.

You can’t imagine how many lives you’re transforming.
— Sophia, 19 (pictured right)

What CCFC activities changed you?
I participated in camps, happy hours (training) and trips. My sponsor encouraged me to study and be a better person. What helped most was meeting others through children’s networks with the same dreams and vision to serve.

How did you feel at the community graduation?
We celebrated the graduation with laughter and tears. We know good work continues here. CCFC will help another community as you helped us.

Since graduating, Sophia’s community has successfully:

• Advocated for the provision of food and supplies from the National Secretariat of Social Action to continue a community soup kitchen
• Hosted an open house at the community centre to share projects, achievements, investments and fundraising procedures with community members and the media
• Presented a proposal for improvements to the community centre to investors and secured funding from corporate sponsors
• Partnered with a local organization to bring youth entrepreneurship training to the community centre

Six-year spotlight ON EDUCATION
Successes, stumbles and how you’re making a difference

Your generosity is helping children access quality education in Burkina Faso, Ethiopia, Ghana, India, Nicaragua and Paraguay.

Here’s where we get to celebrate
During our six-year strategic plan (2013-2018), you helped improve literacy in five of six countries, and boost the percentage of children completing primary school (five percent) and attending secondary school (11 percent). Yay, you! What’s more, 651 schools were built or renovated and 75,439 teachers and community members trained on children’s right to education.

Barriers to education are varied, from the cost of a uniform to a child’s gender or social class. Progress in Ghana, India and Nicaragua was impeded by many long-standing practices, attitudes, and political and economic obstacles, including barriers youth shared below.

WHAT’S NEXT?
Every percentage point showing progress is a hard-fought victory to celebrate. To do better tomorrow, we’ve taken our learnings from the past 58 years and developed five pathways of change. Learn what we want to change and how (turn page).
Ending poverty and creating a more equitable and inclusive world starts with children. Our new Theory of Change reflects this commitment. It states what we want to change and how. And, it empowers a new generation of leaders.

Children’s writer Dr. Seuss once wrote: “A person’s a person no matter how small.” He’s right: children have insights and ideas equally as important as adults.

Partnering with children and youth, engaging with them actively, providing them with opportunities to contribute, and linking young people to planning and policy efforts is vital to the long-term success of development efforts.

As we took a hard look at the results of our six-year strategic plan (2013-2018), our path forward became clear. To ensure children are heard, included and empowered, serious social issues, like child marriage, need to be tackled. We also need to address traditions and practices that violate their rights and limit their ability to achieve their full potential.

Vulnerable children can’t do this alone.

That’s where you come in.

With your support we’ll continue to work alongside children to help make education inclusive and accessible; promote equal rights and opportunities for girls, boys and others often excluded; and build safe, thriving communities.

The result: a new generation of young leaders changing their communities — and the world.
WHAT WE WANT TO CHANGE

5 barriers silencing, excluding and harming children

CHILDREN DENIED AN EDUCATION
Millions of children live near schools but aren’t allowed to enter, others feel unsafe to attend

CHILDREN’S BASIC NEEDS UNMET
Many communities struggle to meet children’s basic needs and are highly vulnerable when hit by drought or other disasters

CHILDREN ABUSED AND EXPLOITED
More than half of the world’s children experience a form of violence and exploitation every day¹

INEQUALITY FOR GIRLS
Girls are the most discriminated group in the world — their rights are continually violated and opportunities denied

CHILDREN’S VOICES SILENCED
Children make up nearly a third of the population, yet their experiences, ideas and insights are rarely heard²

HOW WE WILL CHANGE IT

5 ways we’re helping children to be heard, included and empowered

CHILDREN ARE EDUCATED
We work to ensure boys and girls — regardless of gender, caste or any other difference — receive a safe, inclusive quality education

CHILDREN ARE HEALTHY IN THRIVING COMMUNITIES
We build resilient, resourceful communities that can provide for their children and respond, recover and rebuild when disaster strikes

CHILDREN ARE PROTECTED
We work to reduce all forms of violence and exploitation and ensure children have the tools to overcome injustice and protect their rights

EQUALITY FOR GIRLS
We promote equal rights and opportunities for girls and women and engage boys and men as partners for transformative change

CHILDREN AND YOUTH PARTICIPATE FOR CHANGE
We work to provide children with safe spaces and opportunities to be heard

You can give the gift of education

Consider helping girls around the world access an education they never thought possible.

There are many issues keeping girls out of school. Some fetch water daily from great distances, some care for siblings while their parents work and others are forced into early marriages that keep them home doing chores and raising their children.

Others don’t attend school because of their social status.

Give a girl the gift of education, school supplies or schoolbooks. She deserves to chase her dreams.

SEND A GIRL TO SCHOOL FOR A YEAR ➤ $100
SCHOOL SUPPLIES ➤ $40
SCHOOLBOOKS ➤ $35

Check out ccfcanada.ca/GiftsforGood for gifts from our catalogue that will be combined with other donations to have 5X the impact.
